???.???.????

I woke up early this morning. It was cold and should be October now.
I didn't know how long I slept cause time was meaningless. You may consider me weird, and the fact is, I am. I was diagnosed with Kleine-Levin syndrome, and I lived with my AI, V. I hadn't been out for a while,
and I considered today as of October 1st, 2172.

There was only me and V in the room,
and I was used to it,
so I told her to fetch me some food.
"Same as usual?" She asked me,
but she left without an answer, as she always knew.

I was alone now, so I flipped my diary and came up with an idea
I had never thought of before, a trip.
Living about a hundred years made me judge slower but more open-minded.
It was the time for me to end my life, though not an ideal ending.

Thinking of this,
I climbed out of my dormant cabin.
It was almost out of battery, maybe last a few days longer,
"And you're old too? old friend."
I sighed and turned it off.

V was back with orange-flavored cookies, my favorite one.
When I first came, oranges were considered fruit for the rich,
and people had never seen them here.

"Are you thinking?" V asked because I didn't take over the cookies.
"You kept thinking these days, is it because I did something wrong?"

"That was decades ago, Master." V replied mechanized,
"Due to the development of technologies and the promotion of immigration plans, the supply here was gradually sufficient."

"Do you know the answer? Master?"

Again, the use of word master.
V would use this word when she was questioning or arguing. I couldn't tell when but I didn't like that word. It was a short story: I abandoned my name, so I asked her to call me whatever she wanted, but instead of calling my real name or naming me, she called me master. It created an invisible gap between us, though we share the company's same creator.

We went out and came to the ruin. It used to be a city where robots and humans coexist peacefully, like a paradise; before that was an ordinary town. The people inside are not hospitable, but they did exist cause I had spent decades on this planet thinking about the meaning of my existence.

And we stopped at the edge of the city, it was already dark, but neither of us needed to sleep. The light on the side of the road had broken down, but V plugged in power, the cold light enveloped the two of us, but I felt warm.

I talked to V about my family, everyone in that house represents wealth and power, and I was different because I was a clone. My dad was never fond of the idea of clones, but he loved my mom. Since they could not have a child, they signed a contract with the clone company. I was born knowing myself differently from others. Food is not necessary for me instead of providing energy. I was programmed in that company as its property, and I knew my parents were not my creators. I aged slower than others, and I checked annually with my body status. Though I considered myself a human with a high-functioned brain, others considered me a cyborg/clone. And my dad refused me from calling him dad because we were different.

As the majority believed, endowed clones with human rights disrespect human society, which was me. The capability of a massive functioning brain broke the rules made by humans, and it challenged human beings' position and proved that humans were no longer higher creatures but a kind of vassal used to create clones. I asked V why creators feared their creations, and then I shook my head because I didn't know the answer.

V was a good listener. She said nothing.

So I kept talking about my mom, as I remembered the last day she read me a fairy tale, which was Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. She asked me if I knew why the crow was like a writing desk, and I said I didn't know. She told me it was because Mad Hatter loved Alice. When I asked her if she loved me as much as he did, she left.

That day, I realized that I was abandoned because I was diagnosed with Kleine-Levin syndrome, which was not curable. After being discharged from the hospital, my parents argued over medicines costs and the space project, which is "the space immigration." Isn't that ridiculous? A clone got an untreatable disease and was abandoned because of that.

The book was left on the table, so I turned on the light and read it myself. Alice left the wonderland, and they never met. It was not a fairy tale.

And I felt like nobody. Everyone treated me as a substitute as if I never existed. I didn't tell V that I hacked into a confidential file about me cause it's unnecessary.

She whispered, and I could hear.

I once scanned the clone company that produced me, and it was located on another planet, so that I couldn't keep track of it. My father received a warning from them the other day, and I remember him answering that call angrily. He warned me to stop doing this, and they sent me away on Christmas Eve. Time had smoothed my edges and brought ominous news with it.

V and I were the products of the same period, but the complex structure of his circuit was far beyond my imagination. There were many I hadn't seen before, probably the latest ones. Who was spying on me? Would it be that person? But I lost my value. Why would the company invade V's body through the circuit board?

Invasion?
A planet out of operation for decades was unable to support outside directions! V's code was overwritten because it belongs to the company. And I never escaped because I was trapped in the world of my creator.

But I believed it was not built but grown; it could be easy if we defined it. It was just a name, like clones and droids; there was no soul contained.

"You mentioned yesterday the girl was destroyed? Why not leave."

I didn't know how to answer this question.
Did V comprehend that all people on this planet are robots?
Should I tell her? I couldn't block her from the truth forever.

"Do you know why the space policy was made?"
"You mean immigration to outer space?"
"Yes, if we already exist on various planets, why do we need to relocate?"

"Because the resources were exhausted?"
"But what if humans were capable of space travel already?"
"You mean, they exist because they have immigrated, but this is not possible. If man-kind had mastered this technique, why invented this project?"

We finally came to the cemetery. It was different from my impression, surrounded by walls and breathing white smoke. I was surprised that it wasn't shut down after years. A door was lifted slowly from bottom to top, and sand rolled up from the ground. I considered it as an invitation.

"Let's go." I said to V. The door slowly closed behind us, and it was time for the journey to end.

When the immigration law was first approved, scientists came to this planet to head to the graveyard. Usually in a hurry, and never been seen again. One could occasionally meet a few talking about the experiment, on whether it succeeded or not. They were attracted by it, and I found the answer now. That was the experiment I hacked from the company, my project.

"I am sorry for this Wood Whisperer idea,
it's stupid, and crude, and rushed.
I always know it's a bad idea,
I want to go outside and see the world by myself,
I am sorry for everything I did and every decision I made,
Let's stop finding this Wood Whisperer
because it's not real. It's just something written in the book."

from the first day.
I envy everyone else.
They are free, able to travel elsewhere.
They have been taken good care.
But I'm scared of being thrown away,
I am afraid of everything.
You and me.
I assume that was my program.
And who I was."

My body felt torn apart that they didn't belong to me. My throat was dry, and I opened my eyes slowly to get used to the sun. There was nothing but sand, and I felt something slip from the sky.

It was hard for me to stand up at first,
Then I got used to the pain,
Two steps at a time, I felt the sand cross my feet,
It was rough, boiling my feet,
but I strode forward
And I started running, faster, and faster,

So I ran after it.

My vision was obscured by sand.
It was yellow and red.
It smelt decadence.
The ship paused in front of me,
